Robert has been searching endlessly for a job in website design and has gone through several different platforms with no luck. After meeting with an advisor, she suggests he uses the school's <our product> to search for a job. He first discovers the website and finds an account creation tool. He is given the option to upload his transcript to direct more relevant jobs his way. Because he's interested in what it might show, he does it. Many jobs appear related to what he wants to do and include jobs looking for skills he learned in his courses in college. He sends messages to jobs he finds interesting. Employers get his message and view his profile to see all the qualifications he has. Once Robert finds a job employer willing to hire him, he gets his job.

Jim Morrison is looking to add a new employee at his firm. Because his firm is in close relations with Bingbum University, he calls and they tell him to make a job posting on <our product>. He creates an account that he can use later to make future job posts. He sets out a job notice on the website and the program reads through his desired requirements and filters them to match up with classes that students on the website has taken. He manages to find students which have taken courses that prepared them for this job and exchanges messages with them. He manages to find the right fit.
